After the Mexican war of Independence (1821), the Mexican population had the difficult task to establish their own cultural identity. By rejecting the European culture and thought, Mexicans were comprised by mix races, Indigenous, Afro-Mexican, and European populations. A new culture needed to include all people's in Mexico. Thus, the Chinaco—La Raza Cósmica emerged. The Chinaco ideology established revolutionary social, economic, and political systems that were fought by the Spanish conservatives throughout the 1800s.

Professor Laura Larqué was born and raised in Mexico City. She attended UNAM—earning her BA degree in sociology. She earned her MA degree in history at SSU.

Professor Larqué has been teaching for about 25 years at SRJC.
